CHANGE

Rupture in the structure of international trade: 2003 WTO Cancun Summit

Before Cancun: Hegemonic structure – balance between ideas, institutions and the distribution of power among states.

After Cancun: Normative

 congruence structure – Shift in the distribution of power – new Quad

EU REACTION

Accommodation

- decision-making adaptation in the DDR
- negotiation concessions in DDR
- FTA with emerging countries

2004-2008

2009-today

Entrenchment

- lack of negotiation concessions in DDR
- FTA with Old Quad members

INTERPRETATION

Entrenchment as EU's second-best.

Assumption: the EU wants a multilateral agreement

EU recent bilateral negotiations and agreements should be seen at worst as complementary to multilateral negotiations at the Doha Round and at best as promoters.

Accommodation helps multilateralism

- > Bilateral agreements with emerging powers cannot become substitutes to a multilateral agreement (do not include larger markets or deep WTO+ or WTO-X issues)
- > Efforts in CAP reform (2003 and 2008) would have not been made otherwise

Entrenchment endangers multilateralism

The “exit tactic”

If we do not reach a multilateral agreement
we are going to create an alternative system

Emerging countries will lower their expectations and facilitate a multilateral agreement

Entrenchment endangers multilateralism

It may not work.

- > Emerging countries may not be prepared to accept the multilateral agreement even in these circumstances (coalition rigidities and FTA race)
- > Bilateral agreements with Old Quad partners can become substitutes to a multilateral accord (better best alternative)
especially if one takes into account WTO-X issues

Conclusion

BIC emergence as veto players has led to a CHANGE in the international structure of trade: from hegemonic to normative congruence

EU REACTION has evolved over time: from accommodation to entrenchment

INTERPRETATION: entrenchment is EU's second-best option if effective multilateralism continues to be its leitmotiv in trade.

Conclusion

Nairobi 2015 gives support to this interpretation
